

1.

A woman is murdered during Havenbay's final harbour-ferry loop, yet all six passengers remember watching her walk ashore. Her younger sister has a photograph sent from the empty upper deck after that sighting. As Ally asks the city to reconstruct one crossing, an unlisted passenger emerges and the terminal manager begins contacting witnesses before she can.

2.

A woman is murdered in a Rivermouth boarding house, and every tenant says the landlord was across town. Her sister still lives upstairs, where the same man is using master keys, rent threats and surprise inspections to make her withdraw what she saw. The house protected him because cheap rooms are scarce. Now its silence may leave him alone with the only witness.

3.

A woman disappears after the man she accused of murdering her sister asks to appear on Ally's show and says the sister never died. He brings a recent photograph and knows facts the family never published. If he is lying, he may have taken a second woman. If he is telling the truth, the missing woman built her life around accusing an innocent man.

4.

A woman disappears hours after a private company moves her away from an abusive partner, and the company's owner is also paid by the partner's family. Her advocate is told the route is confidential while another woman receives the same driver. Ally can expose the conflict immediately, but doing so may reveal the refuge route to the man both women fear.

5.

A woman has spent sixteen years in prison for murdering her employer after a jailhouse witness said she confessed. The same witness has appeared in three cases for the same prosecutor, who is now campaigning on never losing a murder trial. Her adult son can force a review only by surrendering letters that may clear her and destroy the life she protected him from.

6.

An adult woman disappeared eighteen years ago after telling neighbours she was leaving her husband. Everyone in the Old Docks row saw him burn her suitcase, and everyone repeated that she had run away because he owned the workshop where their families worked. He still lives there. His new partner is now hiding cash with the same neighbour and insisting she is safe.

7.

A woman was murdered in a warehouse fire seventeen years ago and buried under the false surname she used to get dock work. Her wife was told the dead trespasser was not the woman she reported missing. Now the employer's daughter wants the grave left closed because naming the victim would prove the company denied its own worker and built a waterfront fortune on the lie.

8.

A boxer was murdered behind a Rivermouth gym twelve years ago, and the coach who found him built a respected youth program in his name. He invites Ally to prove the killing was not gang-related and offers a perfect archive. Once the show begins, former fighters return with weigh-in cards and corner photographs he omitted, each showing he changed the victim's final opponent.

9.

A man was convicted of murdering his wife at sea even though her body was never found. Twenty-two years later, evidence from a grave bearing another woman's name may belong to the wife, and the named woman's adult son believes his mother is inside it. Proving who was buried could clear one family and erase the only grave another family has.

10.

A celebrated murder conviction ended a neighbourhood's twenty-year feud, and the victim's widower still speaks publicly about the justice he won. He volunteers for Ally's review, certain the imprisoned woman will fail again. Then three families admit he drafted the statements they signed. Reopening the case could clear a prisoner and expose the people who let one persuasive man speak for an entire street.

11.

A hotel housekeeper's murder was officially solved when her boyfriend confessed, and he died in prison. Nine years later, Ally asks former staff about the night. Three women return to the Highcliff hotel with the same story about the manager's private room checks, and a current housekeeper fails to come home. The old conviction may be protecting a man who still controls their keys.

12.

A woman was convicted of murdering her landlord after his brother found her bloodstained coat in a locked shed. The brother inherited the dead man's Old Docks houses and has spent fifteen years buying the adjoining row while opposing every review. The last tenant now faces eviction after telling Ally the shed never belonged to the victim.
