

PREMISE DELTA v0.7 (THE TRUSTING FORGERY, FIFTH CUT): FABLE ATTACK • 2026-09-11

Fresh Fable agent, given only four-keys-premise-delta-trusting-forgery-v0.7-2026-09-11.md and its own six-front prompt; told to attack the answers in sections 8 to 11. Filed verbatim. GPT's independent attack on the same text goes beside it when Stephen runs it; the disposition follows; Stephen rules. Verdict: REWORK, "confidence high on the driving finding and moderate on the rest"; the driver is Margo's Day 45 call citing the letter to the estate's accountant; "everything else here is survivable with rulings".

Review of premise delta v0.7, the trusting forgery, fifth cut

Read in full, including sections 8 to 11. I engage the v0.7 answers as written. Where a previous round's answer is named but not recorded in the file, I say so rather than re-raise.

Front 1. The kind line.

Objection. The person other than Margo who tests the sentence before Day 60 is the estate's accountant, and he tests it in the same phone call the delta uses as Margo's arrival. Section 5 has Margo tell him three things: Violet's private loan book existed and is not among the books she handed over on Day 8; the van loan to Brad was known to everyone; and "the letter in Violet's hand says it was repaid in October, every penny." The delta then closes the estate's interest on "a certified letter and no paper." That closure is not competent. The accountant has not seen the letter. He has been told of its existence by the debtor's friend, who is also the deceased's own accountant and who, by her own account, advised the deceased on Day -110 to get paper on this exact loan. He has a missing loan book from a house that was locked the night its owner died. He has a sum large enough to buy a van and a first stock of a business, said to have come in as cash in October, with no deposit in any account of a woman whose solicitor's bill for a contested hearing fell due at the month's end and was unpaid at her death. The one thing a competent estate accountant does with that is ask to see the letter, or tell the sister that one exists. Either way the four's Day 14 decision, "Violet's sister hears nothing until they know what they are looking at," is broken on Day 45 by Margo's own mouth, and the delta does not notice that Margo has broken it. What he finds: a letter from the deceased, dated nineteen days before her death, saying someone with her key had been in her house, held back from the next of kin by the four keyholders, containing an instruction not to go to the police, and whose only money claim clears one of the four holders. He also finds that the deceased's mother's ashes are on a sideboard in Ruby's house on that letter's instruction. Section 13's row for the kind line ("Believe it; close the estate's interest; they do") records the wrong outcome for the professional in the chain.

Severity. Serious on its own; fatal in combination with front 6, because it moves the sister's knowledge of the letter and the store from Day 82 to Day 45.

What would have to be true. Margo must answer the accountant without citing the letter, in which case she is lying to a professional about a debt she advised on, not certifying, and section 5's arrival beat is a different beat; or the estate must be shown to have no interest in an unpapered cash loan at all, in which case the accountant never rings and there is no Day 45 call to arrive in. The delta cannot have both the call and the closure.

A smaller point under the same front. Section 2 says only Brad and Margo know "this autumn she started calling it in," and section 5 says Violet told Margo "in July." July is not autumn; and, more to the point, a July conversation is consistent with an October repayment, so what Margo actually holds is not "July against the letter" but Violet's silence to her own accountant through November plus the missing book. That is weaker than section 5 states, and section 5 should say what she holds accurately, because Fable is writing her blind.

Front 2. Margo's lock, fifth time.

Objection. The delta's four reasons she "cannot take it anywhere" are: a July conversation against a letter in Vi's hand; a client's confidence; the room would ask how she knows, in front of him; and the man it points at is defending the man the room has chosen. The last two are reasons about the room, and they hold for the room. The first is addressed above. The second fails on the page: "a client's confidence" is offered as the reason she cannot go to the estate, and the Day 45 call is her disclosing that client's private loan, its counterparty, its book and its claimed repayment to the estate's accountant. The confidence is gone by her own act before the reason is invoked. Her earliest competent action after Day 45 is therefore not to the room and not to Del. It is the thing any bookkeeper who has just answered a professional's question does the same week: confirm in writing what she said, and write it the way a competent one writes it, "per a letter in the deceased's hand held by her friends; I have no independent confirmation; the deceased told me in August she intended to call the loan in for the hearing." That is not an accusation of anyone, it is said outside Brad's hearing, it protects her professionally, and it costs her nothing she has not already spent on the call. What happens: the estate's file now carries, before Day 60, a note from Violet's own accountant that the letter's one money claim is unverified and against the deceased's stated intention. The accountant reads the note and rings the sister. See front 1.

On the room. Section 5 has Margo arguing with Brad through meetings four and five, which means arguing against his defence of Liam, which means she has been Ruby's ally in the Liam case. On Day 54 she stops. Ruby, who drives, has lost her strongest second and will ask, and the delta gives Margo no answer. Whatever she says is said in front of Brad. "I've said what I think" is survivable and is a second let-go by Ruby of the same shape as the police line. But the delta must rule the sentence, because the lock is asserted here and it is the load-bearing lock of the whole premise.

Severity. Serious. The room half of the lock holds; the estate half does not, and it is the half the new round introduced.

What would have to be true. Margo must be a person who, having half-lied to a professional, would rather leave the half-lie standing than correct it in writing. The delta describes the opposite person: the one who told Violet to get paper, who underlines Spring. Or the Day 45 call must be removed, and her arrival moved to a moment that involves no third-party professional.

Front 3. The back door.

Objection. The pool-closing claim is "the only people who ever used that door were the people who came in by the yard: them." The house has a yard, and the workshop whose roof shed the panel is at the house. Violet runs a trade from it. Paint, timber, "garden concentrates" and eight years of collected signs come and go through a yard door, and the back door is the door between that yard and her kitchen. The trick is not knowledge; it is a one-sentence instruction the householder gives to anyone who has ever failed to shut the door in front of her, because the door does not work otherwise. Every delivery driver, every customer given a cup of tea, every person she let out the back after dark in eight years has been told "lift it as you pull," or has discovered it in ten seconds, because a sagging door that catches only when lifted is the commonest door fault on the coast and lifting is what any adult does by reflex. Section 5 forecloses this with two sentences, "the solicitor has never been past her front room; the trade has never been in the house," and neither sentence covers the yard door or a delivery. So the room's Day 15 inference is emotionally right for a frightened room and factually weak, which the chapters may indict later; but the delta presents it as "what lets the four cross out her clearance," and Ruby's line at meeting one, "she thought she'd know, and she's dead," answered only by the door, is carrying more than the door can bear.

On Liam's word. His word is against his own interest (a killer wants the room to look outward; "latched" closes it on himself) and the police who attended on Day 1 would have recorded the doors, so his word is corroborable. The room can rely on it. The problem is not Liam; it is the premise that the trick was private.

Severity. Serious. Not fatal, because a frightened room believing a weak inference is the story's own indictment.

What would have to be true. The door must have become that door recently: Liam fitted it, and the delta does not say when. If the fault dates from a repair this year and only the four have been through it since, the pool closes honestly. As written, "Liam fitted it" and "eight years" of a working yard sit in the same house.

Front 4. Day -9 to Day 0.

Objection. I take the intent as given, since the tin precedes the book and the motive is ruled. On method, the landing holds against the obvious rival: a second, better dose, or a dose in the two glasses on Day 0, leaves a toxicology and the book in the house, and the book records a tin, a panel and a store; a fall closes the police and the book leaves under the coat. That is coherent and I do not attack it. What does not hold is the date, and it is the vo.6 answer to finding 5 that fails. The delta says Day 0 is "the last Monday before the month's end" because "the solicitor's account falls due at the month's end" and she "wanted the van money by then." That is her deadline. It is not his. The loan is on no paper by her choice; the book is the only record and he has read it; her fear names no one; three judges have told her the panel is hers; the store cannot be opened by anyone while she lives; the letters go out only at her death; and he holds deckhand's papers after nine hundred days of preparation. Every danger he faces (the tin in a nurse's hands, the panel in the trade's hands, the letter, the keys, the sheds) becomes live at her death and only then. What a competent man does with nine days of that knowledge is nothing on a date: he lets the month's end pass, lets her be out of pocket to her own lawyer, and leaves on his own schedule, and she cannot sue, cannot show the police anything, and has nothing but a loose lid. The knowledge does not move Day 0 earlier or later; it removes the reason there is a Day 0 at all, unless the world supplies what non-payment by month's end costs him that he cannot walk away from.

Severity. Serious. The device survives it as a story about a man who miscalculated, but the delta claims the opposite: "the plan is made in knowledge, which is this man." A man made of knowledge does not bring every danger forward to avoid a debt he can default on by walking.

What would have to be true. Day -110 must contain a consequence: what Violet said she would do if the money did not come by the month's end, and it must be a thing that reaches the four or the trade or Liam's yard, so that non-payment exposes him in a way that walking does not. The delta records the demand and the date and no consequence.

Front 5. Night one.

Objection. The second line is the kind line, and the tell is inside it: "which I never asked him to do that fast." That clause says she asked. Four people who "know about and do not ask about" her money have just been told, in her hand, that she was calling the van money in this autumn, in the year of the hearing against her sister, and that one of them paid it, every penny, within weeks. Ruby, who has just named the police line as not-Vi and who will say at meeting three that "Vi didn't write down things that didn't bother her," has in front of her a line that announces itself as the one thing on the list that did not bother her, written by a woman who dates and times everything and was asked by herself to list what was odd. The competent question is kind and it is Ruby's: "She asked you for it? You never said." Brad answers in front of Margo, who knows the debt was live at Day -110 and that Violet, who told her everything about money, told her nothing about a repayment. What follows: Margo's arrival moves from Day 45 to night one, and section 5's structure, six weeks of Margo arguing with Brad before she goes quiet, no longer exists; she has her reading at the table on Day 14, and the delta then has to lock forty-six days rather than six. Alternatively Brad's answer ("she was getting the lawyer paid; I had it; it wasn't a thing") is the first time the room hears that the van money was for the fight with the sister, and the room now holds the motive it is not supposed to hold. Section 5 says "nobody lists money" and "the one money fact in the room is on Vi's own list, and it is a kindness." The kindness contains the calling-in.

There is a second consequence for chapter 7. Section 6 offers "the letter's one kindness, about money the café says she was calling in" as a reason to believe Ally. But the letter itself says she asked and he paid. The café line corroborates the kind line; it does not lean against it. Chapter 7 loses that plank.

Severity. Serious.

What would have to be true. The kind line must contain no tell that she asked; the delta must rule that Ruby, having caught one line, does not catch the second; and section 6 must not use the café against a letter that agrees with the café.

Front 6. The whole.

Objection. The earliest competent action that ends the episode before its time is the estate's accountant asking to see the letter on or about Day 45, which is the action the kind line was built to prevent and which the delta's own answer to Margo produces. From there: the sister, hostile, in an active property dispute, with her own solicitor, learns before Day 60 that the four keyholders have a letter in her sister's hand saying someone with a key had been in the house, that they withheld it from her and from the police on that letter's instruction, and that they are holding her mother's ashes. She takes it to her solicitor or to Del the same week. The police now hold the letter and the four before Brad is off Kestrel Head. Any constable holding four envelopes with a solicitor's slip and one box number asks the question chapter 7 saves for Ally, and the sheds are one canvass away. This is not a re-raise of the row 25/R27 police look; it is the police being handed the letter forty days earlier by a chain the fifth cut introduced. The sequence "Day 82 via Ruby" and "the market manager not before Day 82 (GPT concedes)" both rest on the sister being blind until Ruby speaks, and the fifth cut has Margo speak to the sister's own accountant on Day 45.

Two further points of record. First, an inversion: section 2 sends Brad's leaf and size "by post to his flat," and section 3 sends Violet's envelope to "a post office box." A man hiding a craft has the craft's supplies at the box and his friends' post at the flat; the delta has it backwards, and the four read the slip with the box number on night one and can ask why a man with a flat and a van takes Vi's post at a box. Chapter 7's engine should not be a thing the room saw and no one mentioned. Second, three answers this cut relies on are named in sections 8 to 10 but not recorded: what the police did on Day 1 with N^o14's statement that a man left by the back at half past ten on the night of a fatal fall with one glass on the side; what Violet's solicitor did on learning that a client who lodged death-triggered keys nineteen days earlier had died of a fall; and why the room never asks the sheds. I do not re-raise them. I record that the fifth cut cannot be judged whole without them in the document, since each is an earlier competent actor than anyone at Ruby's table.

Severity. Fatal as the delta stands, because the Day 45 mechanism is new this round, is the delta's own answer to two previous findings, and it breaks the Day 82 sequencing that two other answers depend on.

What would have to be true. The estate must never learn that a letter exists before Day 82, which means Margo's Day 45 call must not happen in the form written, which means her arrival needs a different trigger; or the sister, told of the letter on Day 45, must do nothing, against her character as ruled.

Verdict.

REWORK. My confidence is high on the driving finding and moderate on the rest. The single finding that drives it is the estate's accountant on Day 45: the fifth cut answered the vo.6 money findings by replacing Brad's candour with a kind lie and giving Margo a phone call in which she certifies it to a professional, and that call is the one act in the story that puts the letter's existence in front of the sister's own people before Day 60. It cannot both happen and close the estate's interest; a competent accountant asks to see the letter, the sister learns of the letter and the store thirty-seven days before Ruby tells her, and the police are handed the four envelopes while Brad is still in the room. Everything else here is survivable with rulings (date the door; put a consequence on Day -110; strip "that fast" from the kind line and stop chapter 7 using the café against a letter that agrees with it; swap the box and the flat; rule Margo's sentence at meeting six). The Day 45 call is not survivable as written, and Margo's arrival has to be found somewhere that does not involve a third party with a duty to ask.
