

PREMISE DELTA v0.8 (THE TRUSTING FORGERY, SIXTH CUT): CHATGPT ATTACK ·

2026-09-11

ChatGPT, run by Stephen against the prompt at the foot of four-keys-premise-delta-trusting-forgery-v0.8-2026-09-11.md, the same frozen text Fable attacked. Filed verbatim (GPT's punctuation as received). Fable's review is in ...-v0.8-attack-fable-2026-09-11.md (REWORK). Verdict here: REJECT, high confidence, the driver being Brad's reason for needing Violet dead, which is a v8.1 question as much as a v0.8 one. On receipt Stephen asked whether the process is getting anywhere or churning; the answer is in the session record and the next kickoff. No disposition yet.

1. The lock

A competent Violet removes the spare from the pot that morning and tells nobody where she puts it. She may still believe all four, but she can no longer believe the access arrangement. Removing the spare requires no accusation and tests the only mechanism she has identified.

Fatal. It ends this cut as written. Brad has no fifth key, so he cannot enter on Day -9, read the book or steal the paper and pen. The new lock does not answer the old competence problem. It makes it sharper: Violet takes significant action against intrusion, then preserves the exact vulnerability and, after proof that the vulnerability remains live, does nothing.

For this to be answered, Violet must have a compelling reason the outdoor spare cannot be withdrawn even temporarily, must be unable to monitor its use, and Brad must already possess another means of entry. The document supplies none of those things and expressly excludes a fifth key.

1. Margo and the estate

The accountant refers a disputed estate asset to the sister and her solicitor. The solicitor asks Brad for the amount, date, place and circumstances of the alleged cash repayment, any receipt or contemporaneous communication, and an explanation of why the deceased's missing loan book contains the only expected record. The estate's bank and cash transactions are checked. Brad can supply nothing beyond his assertion.

Serious. An accountant does not personally extinguish a material receivable because its debtor says he paid cash. Margo can attest to the original loan, Violet's recent intention to collect it and the absence of any repayment record. The estate may ultimately decide the claim is uneconomic or unprovable, but it remains a disputed asset until the administrator makes that decision on advice. Brad is drawn into a formal account weeks before his planned disappearance, and his unsupported story remains active rather than closing.

For this to be answered, the amount must be too small to pursue, the claim must be legally or evidentially unrecoverable, and the sister's solicitor must advise a documented write-off. "Unpapered cash loan" alone is not enough.

1. Brad's death

Brad does not need Violet's death to supply believable grief. He can stage an accidental death, which requires no grief motive at all. If he insists on an apparent suicide, his approaching financial exposure already supplies a comprehensible private crisis. More damagingly, living Violet is the person most likely to authenticate his supposed death emotionally. She trusts him completely and has explicitly ruled out his authorship of the panel.

Fatal. Killing the one convincing mourner before staging his own death is not the cheapest route to being believed dead. The debt might make Violet mention money, but it does not make a drowning false, and she presently possesses no evidence connecting Brad to the panel or an assumed identity. Murder creates a second death, a homicide exposure and the very group inquiry he must manipulate.

For this to be answered, a living Violet must be certain to challenge the staged death with specific evidence capable of leading investigators to Brad's survival or deckhand identity. The cut establishes the opposite: she trusts him and believes he cannot gild.

1. The instruction

The four lists do not come back empty. Liam's contains boatyard workers, owners, customers and people around his home. Ruby's contains hospital colleagues, roster staff, patients and household visitors. Margo's contains clients and people with access to her work or home. Brad's contains customers, suppliers, postal contacts and people around his van and box. Even after ordinary contacts are discarded, those are the categories the instruction requires them to examine.

Brad's salted items do not survive beside those lists. Liam's concealed ownership is not a person who approached Liam. Liam asking Violet about her mother is not someone obtaining the spare's location from him. Ruby working nights is a schedule, not a person near Ruby. The kind line is equally unresponsive. Violet's supposed list is not an access list at all. It is a collection of facts about three named friends.

Fatal. On Day 19 the forged section reveals itself as a different kind of document from the one it orders them to create. It does not widen the search outward and then fail. It points inward while claiming Violet believed none of them responsible.

For this to be answered, "who has been near each of you" must naturally produce no people for four socially and professionally active adults, while the table must also accept unrelated biographical facts as compliant entries. The wording does not permit both.

1. Night one, again

The line is: "Not the police. I've nothing they'd act on and I won't have them in your lives over a shelf."

Violet wrote that before her death, but the recipients are reading it because she has since died at the foot of her stairs. They now have a posthumous account of unauthorized entry after a lock change, an object moved in her bedroom and a delivery mechanism triggered by her death. They are no longer being asked whether to trouble police "over a shelf."

Fatal. Ruby already catches that the line does not sound like Violet. Liam's answer explains Violet's hostility toward police after her mother's death. It does not explain why four competent adults treat her earlier assessment of the evidence as binding after the circumstances have materially changed. They preserve the original, contact the solicitor and take the letter to Del. The sealed private room does not last six meetings.

For this to be answered, the four must possess a concrete reason that reporting the letter after Violet's death would cause a greater identifiable harm than withholding it. Loyalty to her stated preference does not carry that decision.

1. The whole

The earliest competent action is on Day -37. Violet changes the lock because she suspects somebody has entered her home, but then creates another unattended outdoor spare and announces its location to every person within her only possible access pool. A competent security response does not reproduce the compromised arrangement. She removes uncontrolled access or silently monitors it.

Fatal. This happens before the locker, the forgery, the murder and the room. The later shelf movement only proves that her first response failed and makes continued inaction less defensible. Her reluctance to accuse the four explains why she does not confront them. It does not explain why she declines private, non-accusatory control of her own door while constructing a padlock, four solicitor-held keys and a posthumous investigation.

For this to be answered, uncontrolled access by all four must be indispensable, observation must be impracticable, and Violet must have a reason to accept continuing entry into her bedroom. None is present.

REJECT. Confidence: high. The finding that most drives the verdict is Brad's death. The cut asserts that Violet must die so the town will believe his later death, but living Violet is already his strongest credible mourner and holds no actionable evidence that he survived. Without a demonstrated reason her continued life defeats his escape, the murder remains the most dangerous act in his plan rather than the necessary one.
