

EPISODE ONE

The premise

v6, 2026-08-29. Working title not settled.

Trish read v5 on 28 August and agreed, with Fable to write. Her two amendments are folded into this version: Alice's death now has a named injury, and what Alice hid is promised an answer rather than left open-ended.

Names are placeholders only. Alice, Bobby, Carla, Dan and Edward are there so nobody has to hold four unnamed people in their head. Fable invents the real ones next, and will deliberately not be told which of them did it.

Alice dies in her own home, at the foot of her own stairs. Blunt force trauma to the head, which is exactly what a fall like that leaves, and exactly what something else leaves too. It is recorded as an accident, so nobody investigates, and within a few weeks it is simply a sad thing that happened to somebody.

She had four close friends: Bobby, Carla, Dan and Edward. In the months before she died Alice had become frightened, because she had worked out that one of those four was planning to kill her. She hid what she had. She did not go to the police, partly because what she had was not quite proof, and mostly because taking it to them meant accusing somebody she loved. So she made an arrangement instead. If anything happened to her, all four of them would be sent a key.

After the funeral, the keys arrive in the post. All four of them go to the same place.

It is already empty.

So four people who loved Alice are left knowing one thing for certain: one of the other three got there first. They have nothing they can take to the police. What they have is each other, and the fact that between them they knew her better than anyone alive did. They start meeting. They start trying to work out which of them it is.

Carla gets close. She keeps it entirely to herself, because you do not say that out loud about a friend until you are certain.

She does not have to say it. Bobby is the only person in that room who knows for certain that one of them is guilty and exactly which one, and he has spent weeks sitting in those meetings watching three people hunt him. He does not need Carla to accuse him. What he notices is that she has completely stopped looking at Dan and Edward.

A few days later Bobby disappears. His car is found near the coast, at a spot the whole city knows people go to when they want to end things. His phone is left on the seat. No body is ever recovered, which is normal there; some are found years later and most are never found at all. His bank accounts are never touched again. His things stay in his flat exactly as he left them.

And Carla stops.

Because there are only two ways to read it. Either she was wrong about him, or she was right and she made a man jump off a cliff. She cannot live inside the second one, so she chooses the first, and she lets it go. It never stops bothering her.

Months later a stranger begins talking to Carla. He knows things about Bobby's death that nobody has said out loud, and everything he offers points her gently somewhere else. When it becomes clear that she is not being turned, he tells her he will meet her and give her the rest, and he names the place: the spot where the car was found.

She goes.

Carla falls onto the rocks, and her body washes up in Havenbay harbour a few days later. There is nothing about her injuries that a fall does not explain, so nobody thinks she was pushed and they assume she jumped. And everybody has a reason ready, because she had spent months blaming herself for the friend who went off the same cliff.

Three friends gone, one after another, and the city settles on grief. It happens.

Except that Dan and Edward each know something the police do not. One of those four murdered Alice and emptied that cupboard, and each of them knows that it was not him.

And once you are holding that, two friends going off the same cliff inside a year stops looking like grief and starts looking convenient.

Dan is afraid of Edward. Edward is afraid of Dan. And each of them is frightened enough to walk into a police station and say so.

Two men accusing each other of at least one death and possibly three, neither able to account for where they were. It is front page news, and Ally's podcast picks it up a day later.

And this is what she walks into. Two men who have not been charged with anything and never will be, being taken apart in public by each other and by an entire city. Work, family, the street they live on. Nothing about it improves while the case stays where it is, and one of them is not going to survive it.

Bobby is alive. He faked his own death. He is four hundred miles away under another name and he thinks it is finished, and he is not wrong to think so. He killed Alice, he removed the one person who was about to see it, he did it in a way that reads as grief, and he left the last two friends behind doing the rest of the work for him.

Ally comes to all of this afterwards. She prevents nothing, and she could not have. What her podcast does, slowly, is establish that the man everybody has spent months mourning was never harmed at all.

She does not do it alone, and she could not have. Her listeners do it. Small pieces from subscribers, some of them anonymous and some not. Somebody who kept a message Carla sent them and thought nothing of it at the time.

And eventually a woman four hundred miles away who has been listening to a description of a man for six weeks, and who has slowly understood that she knows him, under a different name, and that he has been sitting across a table from her.

Who Bobby is

A man who genuinely believed he was cleverer than everybody around him, and that he could kill more than once and never have it land on him.

He was wrong.

Still open, so you know what you can change

- The title. Five Keys After Midnight is retired. Current suggestion is The Friend They Mourned.
- Who these five actually are. Not decided at all. Fable writes them next.
- What Alice hid, and how she came by it. Trish's read: we need to know, or the story is empty. So this is open only as to what it is; that the episode answers it is settled, and it gets decided before Fable writes, not discovered along the way.
- How long ago all of this happened, and how long Ally's podcast runs for.
- Which of Dan or Edward comes to Ally, and whether either of them is anything to her already.
- Where in Havenbay it sits, including which stretch of coast.
- How it ends, and what it costs.

Settled, and expensive to move: four friends rather than five · Alice's death recorded as an accident · her injury a named one that a fall fully explains, so the question "an unfortunate slip, or murder" can stand · the episode answering what she hid · the place already empty when they get there · Carla keeping her suspicion to herself · Bobby vanishing before Carla dies rather than after · the stranger who feeds her false leads first and kills her when that stops working · her injuries explaining themselves · Bobby being unquestionably dead in the mind of everybody in Havenbay · Ally arriving after all of it · the listeners finding the pieces.